How media cast female candidates

Source SheSpeaks online survey of 250,000 female members

TERRY BYRNE AND PAUL TRAP, USA TODAY

Previous studies

- ▶ Consensus: gender bias in media coverage has decreased over time
- ▶ Disagreement: nature and extent of remaining biases
- ▶ Studies tend to rely on relatively small samples and manual coding

Our approach

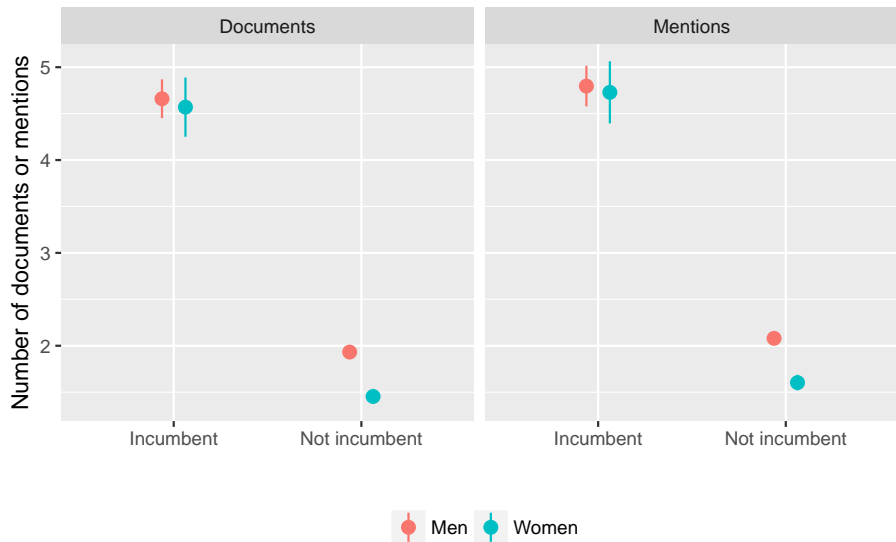

- ▶ Almost comprehensive sample of newspaper coverage of the 2015 Swiss national elections (2.5 months, 70 sources, 200,000+ articles, all 3900 candidates)
- ▶ Analysis in three steps:
 1. Candidate level: number of mentions and number of articles with mentions (negative binomial models)
 2. Article level: which topics are associated with male and female candidates? ⇒ Structural topic models (Roberts et al. 2014; Roberts et al. 2016)
 3. Article level: within topics, which words are associated with male and female candidates? ⇒ Structural topic models (Roberts et al. 2014; Roberts et al. 2016)

Conclusion

- ▶ Less media attention to female candidates only if non-incumbent; no gender bias for incumbents
- ▶ Topics co-vary with the gender of candidates mentioned in the articles
- ▶ Content of topics not obviously biased at first sight
